

Sam Lynskey,

Clinical Pharmacist

In the health care team there are so many players and we are all working towards a common goal, which is to achieve the best possible outcome for the patient. I pursued Pharmacy because I enjoy engaging with people as a “people’s person”. At the same time it has allowed me to fulfill my fascination for the medical sciences. Pharmacy seemed the ideal medium to allow me to positively influence people’s lives whilst furthering my interest of disease and treatment.

A degree does not by any means complete one’s education as medicine is continually advancing and as health professionals it is our job to stay on top of new developments. In order to be successful as a pharmacist you must have an interest in science and be able to communicate effectively. Good luck with whatever path captivates your interest, I would strongly encourage you to talk to and question the people whose job you are interested by. But most importantly, never let go of your dreams.
